Be prepared. Know the warning signs and know what to do.

What is premature labor?

This term refers to labor you go into before 37 weeks of pregnancy, or three or more weeks before your due date. Babies born this early may have serious health problems.

Are you at risk?

Women most likely to have an early birth are those who:

- Have had previous premature labor or delivery.
- Expect twins, triplets or more.
- Smoke, drink or use drugs while pregnant.
- Lack care or get late care while pregnant.
- Are victims of domestic abuse.
- Stand for long periods of time or work long hours.
- Are stressed.
- Have urinary tract infections (UTIs), vaginal infections or sexually transmitted infections (STIs).
- Are severely overweight.
- Were underweight before pregnancy.
- Have diabetes, high blood pressure or blood clotting disorders.
- Are African-American.
- Are younger than 17 or older than 35.

Know the warning signs.

If you have just one of these warning signs, call your doctor or go to the hospital right away:

- Contractions (when your stomach tightens) every 10 minutes, or three or more in 30 minutes
- Pelvic pressure that feels like your baby is pushing down
- Backache below your waist, right above your tailbone
- Increased vaginal discharge that has clear, pink or brown fluid or blood
- Cramps that feel like you're on your period
- Stomach cramps with or without diarrhea
Protect yourself and your baby.

Just because you are at risk doesn’t mean that you will go into premature labor. Take steps to ensure a healthy birth:

- Ask your doctor or nurse about kick counts to make sure your baby is moving.\(^5\)
- Know the warning signs. Call your doctor right away if you have any signs.\(^6\)
- Take care of your health while you are pregnant.
